ONE-SENTENCE SYNOPSIS

A medium channels a screenwriter to complete his unfinished script, but she later claims that the dictation was actually her creation; hence, she is entitled to half the script's earnings.

SYNOPSIS

After the death of Roy, a famous screenwriter, his film director's son discovers an unfinished script amongst the personal possessions his father left behind. He asks Ann, a medium, to contact his father for the end of the script through channeling. The film he directs from this script receives an award at the Berlin International Film Festival and competes for the Oscar for Best Foreign Language Film. During an interview, the director mentions that he obtained the ending through Ann's powers.

After reading the interview, Ann's grandchild approaches her. His mother once told him that grandma's channeling is actually bogus; she merely pretends, in order to earn a living. He begs Ann to testify to this so that she can be acknowledged as one of the script's creators and entitled to some of the profits. Ann has been estranged from her family for a long time and wants to alleviate her grandchild's financial burdens by sharing in the profits. However, this confession poses a dilemma for her: not only will it destroy her image and personal reputation, but it also will hurt the neighbours who have been relying on her service to communicate with the deceased.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

Being misunderstood is the worst thing in life.

When lying becomes a consolation, should we keep lying or tell the truth and risk hurting other's feelings?

Ann, a medium, faces a dilemma. Testifying to claim a share in a film's profits means she will have to tell the truth. But in testifying, she will need to confess that she has been lying and that all channeling services are bogus. She will help her grandchild to win the case (and do no harm to the now-successful film director), but she will hurt the neighbours who have been relying on her services to communicate with the deceased.

Ann is not only jeopardizing her career but also risking the neighbours' spiritual support.
